The mystery policymaker

Cameron's legacy Britain's prime minister wants to be remembered for capturing the centre ground. Brexiteers have other plans: Bagehot, page 28. A prominent critic of multiculturalism provokes more heated debate on race and faith, page 26. Putting big political issues directly to the voters is not more democratic, and usually gets worse results: leader, page 10

Is Facebook biased? The social network's power has made it controversial with conservatives. But its importance to politics will continue to grow, page 33. Platforms are the future—but not for everyone: Schumpeter, page 58

Gangs in El Salvador Violent extortionists are sucking the country dry, page 39

Who should run the UN?

A soggy consensus holds that the next UN boss should be an eastern European woman. Nonsense: leader, page 11. Why the choice for the next secretary-general will probably be a stitch-up, page 49. The difficulties of peacekeeping in places like Congo, page 50. Who fights, and who pays, page 52

Oil and climate change

Climate-conscious shareholders are putting Big Oil on the spot, page 53

Central banks and recession

When periods of economic growth come to an end, old age is rarely to blame: Free exchange, page 64. America's next president should modernise the Federal Reserve system: leader, page 10
