TEXT 1: JOSÉ ADOLFO QUISOCALA IS CHANGING THE WORLD KEY

1 When he was seven, José Adolfo Quisocala created a bank for school friends in his hometown of Arequipa, Peru, to save
2 money to buy books, stationery and uniforms. Now, nine years later, the Bartselana Student Bank has 6,700 customers, all aged 3 under 18. All these children can add more money to their savings by taking plastic and paper to recycle to school bus stops —the 4 money is automatically credited to their bank accounts. Every month, the bank recycles between 15 and 16 tons of paper and 5 plastic.

6 The idea came to Quisocala when he saw children begging at traffic lights and wondered how he could help them and their 7 families earn and save, and at the same time recycle household rubbish that would otherwise become litter. He left school to 8 pursue his idea, but it was worth it, he says. "In my town, I considerably reduced the level of child poverty, the school drop-out rate 9 and environmental pollution."

10 Quisocala also helped create the Bartselana Foundation, which turns donations of recyclable waste from local companies into 11 funds to combat child hunger and improve education. The foundation has been making free online educational videos lately, which 12 they put out via social media, explaining how to distinguish different types of plastic and paper for recycling, for example. "This is 13 relevant information which is not taught at school so we make it public and free to watch," says Quisocala.

14 Now 16, he plans to pass the bank to another young executive in order to go to university. He intends to continue his social 15 activism, working with the "least-favoured or forgotten groups in Latin America" and helping them benefit from carrying out 16 environmental services.

TEXT 2: GARUM IN THE 21st CENTURY KEY

- 1 In modern laboratories, scientists are working to recreate garum, a sauce made from putrefying fish that was beloved by the 2 ancient Greeks and Romans but hardly sounds appealing to 21st-century food lovers.
- 3 The Latin term garum could refer to both a sauce used in the cooking process —sometimes also called liquamen— and to a 4 condiment, made with the blood and viscera of fish, that writers such as Petronius, Ausonius and Seneca knew as garum sociorum
5 (“garum of the allies”).
- 6 Archaeologists had been unsuccessful in extracting well-preserved garum at excavations in Tunisia and other Mediterranean
7 locations until Italian researchers in 2009 discovered six sealed dolia —large clay amphoras— in a building that they named the 8 Garum Shop at Pompeii. The eruption of Mount Vesuvius in AD 79 had buried the building under ash, thus perfectly preserving a 9 small liquamen factory.
- 10 Food technicians from the universities of Cadiz and Seville analysed the contents of the dolia at Pompeii and, using that 11 information and a liquamen recipe thought to have been written in the third century AD, produced what they claim is the first 12 scientific recreation of the 2,000-year-old fish sauce. This recreation is called Flor de Garum and is being sold in amphora-shaped 13 glass bottles throughout Spain. Chefs state that it supercharges dishes with a potent flavour.
- 14 It has been said that it is impossible to recreate definitive modern versions of these Roman ancient fish sauces, but at least 15 this is the first time in modern history that a scientific reconstruction of garum has been successfully achieved.
