On the cover

On the cover

The era of predictable improvement in computer hardware is ending. What comes next? Leader, page 11. After a glorious 50 years, Moore's law—which states that computer power doubles every two years at the same cost—is running out of steam. Tim Cross asks what might replace it: Technology Quarterly, after page 42. Win or lose, a computer program's showdown against a professional Go player is another milestone in AI, page 69

Turmoil in Britain's Tory party

Iain Duncan Smith's flounce was opportunistic, but he is on to something: leader, page 14. The balance of tax and welfare changes is tilting further in favour of the rich, page 30. The split between Iain Duncan Smith and George Osborne epitomises their party: Bagehot, page 32

Crisis in Brazil

The time has come for a tarnished president to resign: leader, page 13. Dilma Rousseff's chances of remaining in office are diminishing by the day, page 44. Lula's fall from grace: Bello, page 46. The economy is crumbling but giant pulp firms are booming, page 57

Trump and the world

If Donald Trump wins the nomination he is likely to ditch half a century of Republican thinking on foreign policy, page 37
